Today, in addition, Mauritius positions itself as an acknowledged business and investment destination.

Located at half an hour flight to the North-East of the French Overseas Department of Réunion island, Mauritius has but two to four hours' time lag with Europe, Africa, Asia – all continents wherefrom the Mauritian population originally came.

First colonised by the Dutch, Mauritius thereafter became French in 1715; British from 1810 to its independence in 1968. Mauritians speak French, English and Creole in addition to Asian languages, for some. The country raises unanimous admiration for the multiracial harmony and fascinating mix of cultures it exemplifies.

Indeed, Tamarin remains in its very soul an easy-to-live and easy-to-love village.

Sheltered from the wind, revelling in an unending summer and the most spectacular sunsets, the sun-drenched coast of Mauritius unfolds its many attractions between landscape and seascape. Introducing AKASHA

Akasha's topography offers a natural belvedere. Landwards, it enjoys a chain of sculptural mountains for a backdrop; to its left a view of the golf course of Tamarina; seawards it overlooks the luxuriant haven of the property, the villas at the heart of the village and offers a wide-angled view fanning the estuary, the bay and the endless ocean. In the upper parts of the estate, the Villas Corniche, Villas Montagne and Villas Hameau enjoy a panoramic view.

The riverside villas nestle in settings of greenery gently sloping down and expanding towards the banks of the river that starts to widen out there. Upstream are the Villas Arena; they are tucked away in the most secret part of the property, sheltered at the heart of a sheer oasis composed of century-old mango trees. Here, one can only hear birds whistling and the relaxing sound of the river as it flows over the black basalt rocks that have been polished by ages of running water.

Following the course of the river downstream, come the Villas Barachois. These enjoy the luxury of spacious gardens that extend up to the water's edge where the river slows down and starts to meander in between land flats.

Further downstream, where the river widens out to become an estuary, the Villas Mangrove face the wide expanse of roiling waters that go murmuring.

The Masterplan

From Akasha, it meanders leisurely across an estuary to merge with the wide lagoon of Tamarin Bay. Akasha's villas have been set out and designed following the natural slope of the site. They make the most of the view and its array of vivifying greens and blues that keep shifting in hues between the lush vegetation, the lively lagoon and endless ocean.
